Nasogastric feeding at the end of life A virtue ethics

The use of Nasogastric (NG) feeding in the provision of artificial nutrition and hydration at the end of life has, for the most part, been regarded as futile by the medical community. This position has been led chiefly by prevailing medical data. In Singapore, however, there has been an increase in

Adherence to Pediatric Acute Chemotherapy Induced Nausea

Guidelines may address some of these concerns, but institutional issues and individual clinical experience will also affect antiemetic selection. In addition, dose rounding is a common practice to achieve practical dose volumes for administration in children.
